Preparing Your Tween for Middle School Talk About Social Pressures

The middle school years present enormous social pressures for children and introduce them to a variety of dangers. Take every possible opportunity to reinforce your family's rules and values regarding smoking, drugs, alcohol, dating, co-ed sleepovers, and any other issues of concerns. Role play with your child about how he should react when confronted by a classmate to smoke or drink alcohol. Stay on top of your child's social situation by getting to know his friends and their parents. If you see a change in your child's personality, or his grades begin to drop, take action. Contact the school guidance counselor to find out if there might be something going on at school or on the bus, such as bullying. Remind your child every now and then that you are there to help, and that he can talk to you about anything.
